22 Abstract

23 Torture seeks to undermine not only the physical and emotional well-being of an individual but 24 to damage the coherence of entire communities. Thus, torture and state repression are used to 25 weaken entire subpopulations. After the failed coup d'état in Türkiye in 2016 and during the 26 subsequently following state of emergency that lasted until 2018, allegations of torture and 27 other degrading treatment in Türkiye spread widely. Since then, the number of asylum-seekers 28 in Germany has risen considerably.

29 This paper analyses the reports of twenty Turkish citizens that fled to Germany to seek asylum 30 in the aftermath of the events. In semi-structured interviews held in Turkish, we assessed the 31 experiences of torture and state repression, psychological consequences, and the current well-32 being and living situation.

33 All interviewees described illicit experiences with violence from state authorities and 34 government supporters, especially while under arrest. Though the methods varied, there was a 35 constant pattern of imbalance of power. The psychological impact of these methods were 36 present after relocation in Germany and included signs of PTSD, anxiety disorders, and major 37 depression.

38 The reports of torture, state repression, and their psychological impact emphasise the 39 importance for policy makers to address the prevention of human rights violations and support 40 the needs of survivors.

44 Introduction

45 Torture is a dehumanizing crime that seeks to undermine an individual’s personality (1). The 46 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment 47 (UNCAT), Art. 1, defines torture as “any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether 48 physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from 49 him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person 50 has committed (...) when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of (...) a 51 public official” (2). State repression is understood as the use of fear tactics and the restriction 52 of civil liberties of political opponents by government authorities, the political party in power, 53 and its supporters (3). As of June 2023, the UNCAT has 173 state parties, including Türkiye 54 (2).

55 Nevertheless, torture is still practiced in many countries today, having major social and 56 psychological consequences for their societies. Among others, trauma sequelae disorders, such 57 as post traumatic distress, major depression or anxiety disorders, are prevalent in persons that 58 were exposed to state repression and torture (1,4,5). Survivors often not only report emotional 59 symptoms but also sleep disturbances, chronic pain, headaches, and difficulty in concentrating 60 (5,6). Accordingly, in a comparison between tortured and non-tortured activists, torture raised 61 negative psychological effects independent of other stressors in a politically repressive 62 environment (7).

63 Türkiye is one of the European countries that support UNCAT but have allegedly practiced 64 torture in the last decade (8–11). Torture and other ill-treatment by the Turkish state towards 65 political dissidents has been documented by UN Subcommittee on prevention of torture in 2017
66 and the Council of Europe anti-torture Committee (8,9,11,12). Meanwhile, the institutionalised 67 use of repression and torture, especially against Kurds and left-wing citizens, was carried out 68 long before (4,13–15). Allegations against gendered political violence, as well as rape and 69 torture by police officers in custody in Türkiye are common (16,17). State repression against 70 ethnic minorities, particularly its large Kurdish population, has led to widespread claims of 71 human rights abuses and a large number of political refugees claiming to have suffered torture 72 (4,17). Furthermore, the criminalisation of the petition signed by the so called “Academics of 73 Peace” was seen as a massive suppression of academic freedom (18–20). In 2015, peace talks 74 with the Kurdish minority ended and subsequently led to the deterioration of the relationship 75 with the government. The overall security situation worsened as Türkiye was shaken by various 76 suicide attacks in the following years claimed by the Daesh, among them a detonation of 77 explosives at the “Labor, Peace and Democracy Rally” that took place on 10 October 2015 in 78 Ankara (21). At this occasion alone, more than 100 civilians were killed and over 500 people 79 were injured. On 15 July 2016, an unsuccessful coup attempt by the military led to the 80 imprisonment of intellectuals, purges in the Turkish military and mass dismissals in the public 81 sector (18,20,22,23). Subsequently, the government imposed a state of emergency that lasted 82 for two years (18). Entailed by these developments, Türkiye is one of ten nationalities with the 83 highest rate of asylum applications in Germany since 2017. From 2017 until 2019 alone, 84 Germany registered around 29.000 applications for asylum from Turkish citizens, making it the 85 third biggest group of new asylum seekers in 2019 (24).

86 To our knowledge, no other study so far has analysed the psychological consequences of 87 vulnerable groups within Türkiye that have fled the country in the aftermath of the end of peace 88 talks between the Turkish government and the Kurds, the failed coup d'état, and the prolonged 89 state of emergency. Therefore, the presented study aimed at a) assessing personal experiences 90 of torture and state terror in Türkiye between 2015-2018 and b) the evaluation of the mental 91 health burden that arose due to these experiences.

93 Methods

94 Study design and ethical considerations

95 The study took place on the premises of the Heidelberg Institute of Forensic and Traffic 96 Medicine in the first year of the COVID-19 pandemic. Given the exploratory character of our 97 research questions, we conducted a qualitative study with semi-structured interviews with 98 Turkish asylum seekers and refugees on their experiences in Türkiye between 2015-2018 and 99 the subsequent impact on previous and current mental health.

100 This study followed the ethical standards laid down in the 1964 Declaration of Helsinki about 101 confidentiality, informed consent, and a guided research protocol. The interviews followed the 102 Istanbul Principles, the recommendations of the Istanbul Protocol (1) for the documentation of 103 torture. Safety and confidentiality were established by conducting private interviews in a 104 separated room. The study was approved by the Ethics Commission of the Medical Faculty at 105 Heidelberg University (S170/2020; 30.03.2020). All participants were fully informed about the 106 aims and methods of the study and completed an informed consent form prior to participation.
107 There was no reimbursement for participation, but travel expenses were covered.

108

109 Participants and Procedure

110 Our targeted group were asylum-seekers from Türkiye that fulfilled the following inclusion 111 criteria: Age of 18 or older and residence in Türkiye for at least one year during the period of 112 interest from 24 July 2015 until 18 July 2018. We searched for participants with messages on 113 notice boards, via non-governmental organisations, and personal contact to the local Turkish 114 community from 02 May 2020 until 15 October 2020. The researchers handed out information 115 and the Harvard Trauma Questionnaire (HTQ) upon request (25). Eligible participants filled 116 out the HTQ to assess an indication of experiences of torture and state repression between July 117 2015 until the official end of the state of emergency in July 2018. If the individual was willing 118 to participate in the study and fulfilled all requirements, they contacted the second author (I.S.)

119 and arranged a meeting on the premises of the Institute for Forensic and Traffic Medicine of 120 the University of Heidelberg. We included all Turkish refugees that answered to our posting 121 and expressed to have experienced torture in their home country.

122 Upon arrival, all participants signed a form that stated they had no symptoms of Covid-19 and 123 the medical researcher (I.S.) measured their temperature. Thereafter, participants answered 124 questions concerning sociodemographic data, such as age, nationality, religion, ethnicity, and 125 educational level. All interviews were audio recorded and conducted in Turkish by the first 126 authors (E.T. and I.S.), facilitated by German – Turkish interpretation in both directions by the 127 second author (I.S.) who also clarified cultural queries if necessary. The Appendix offers the 128 original version of all quotes.

129

130 Data analysis

131 To obtain descriptive statistics, the analysis of demographic variables and baseline 132 characteristics was managed with Excel, program version 16.75.2 (26). All interviews had a 133 length of one to two hours, including the time needed for interpretation Turkish - German. They 134 were transcribed verbatim in Turkish following predefined transcription rules and translated 135 into German by the second author (I.S.). We used the written translation of the original Turkish 136 text parts instead of the spontaneous translation into German on the recording to stay as close 137 as possible to the original statements. The qualitative data was analysed with MAXQDA 2022, 138 Release 22.2.0 (27), led by the principles of qualitative content analysis following Mayring 139 (28). The first author developed a coding framework combining inductive and deductive 140 themes, guided by a review of relevant literature on torture. Inductive codes were derived 141 directly from the narratives. Each statement, either a single sentence or content related 142 sentences, was assigned to our key research topics as a content analytic unit of analysis. Some 143 phrases referred to more than one category, so double categorisation was possible. Each single 144 or multiple content-bearing sentence was seen as a basic unit and was coded by a term that 145 formed a relevant category. Afterwards, the categories were summarised into main themes until 146 a final number of relevant main themes for all participants was found (commonly termed 147 content saturation). If necessary, the main themes and categories were adjusted to form a 148 common category (28).

150 Results

151 A total of  $N = 25$  participants filled out the HTQ, of which five participants declined 152 participation due to safety concerns and fear of political consequences.  $N = 20$  participants took 153 part in the study. All but one participant, whose interview was conducted in German, provided 154 their answers in Turkish. Table 1 shows the sample characteristics of all study participants.
155 Most interviewees arrived in Germany between 2017-2019 and several were granted asylum 156 for three years, but some were still waiting for a decision by the authorities.

168 Experience of violence

169 The interviewees described their experiences with different forms of state repression and torture

170 by the use of force, threats, and sexual assault. Table 3 indicates the frequencies for different 171 forms of violence that participants marked in a checklist.

172

176 Torture (51 quotes): All interviewees described some form of torture, either psychologically or 177 physically. Some witnessed physical violence towards friends and family in prison or in public 178 spaces, others experienced it themselves. Eleven out of twenty interviewees described torture 179 in detention or after abduction with tremendous human rights violations. Some provided 180 detailed depictions of torture with highly specialised means and knowledge used to obtain 181 confessions or to stop people from being politically active. Some mentioned isolated cells that 182 had been equipped with sound insulation, light that shone constantly 24/7, and meals being 183 served at randomly varying times to affect the sense of time. Two participants reported that, 184 occasionally, the guards played loud military music all day long and forced them to stay awake.
185 One participant described being kept in an underground room for hours, where the ground 186 emitted electric shocks and burned his feet. He experienced induced choking when a police 187 officer knelt on his chest and larynx while pressing a wet towel on his nose. Some described 188 the constant fear of being followed or under surveillance in a dangerous political environment 189 as torture. The bombing at a peace rally in Ankara in 2015 was considered as torture, as several 190 participants suspected that the state authority knew about the attacks without intervening.

191 As I said, one of the methods of torture is, for example, the national anthem (...). But there they play it, play 192 it again, play it again, play it again, play an anthem, then the army march [Mehter Marşı], and you go crazy.
193 And that loud noise, they are trying to drive you crazy, they are brainwashing you. (TN 21, Pos. 35)

194
195 For 93 days, what I experienced and heard, the questions I was asked, the attitudes of the people who asked 196 me questions, their professional experience, the technological possibilities they had access to, I was taken to 197 a torture centre where each of the scientific torture methods were applied, not a gang, not three or five punks, 198 but an organised torture centre with changing shifts. I already had in my mind "maybe I will be killed"... (TN 199 21, Pos. 36)

200
201 Arbitrariness and state violence (57 quotes): Interviewees described various forms of police 202 assaults. Nearly all participants described physical and psychological violence as threats, 203 insults, or punches, when they were forced to provide fingerprints in state prisons. As a formal 204 requirement, interviewees described a medical examination before and after their custody.

205 Although this procedure was formally followed in most cases, it often resulted in the injuries at 206 hand being intentionally ignored. Only one participant stated that the doctor resisted the police 207 and declined to write a report. In public spaces or online, some stated they were threatened and 208 told to stop their political activism. Some learned that their telephone conversations had been 209 tapped for months to years. Two interviewees reported they had been kidnapped by special 210 forces and were interrogated by them. Several participants said specifically that, in order to 211 cause fear, police officials described the violence they were about to inflict upon them. Others 212 felt that the level of repression rose after the failed coup attempt.

213 The police entered the university; we did some small political work at that time... They threatened me, 214 saying "your father and brother are imprisoned, we will arrest you, too"... (TN 12, Pos. 19)

215
216 They beat you and frightened you there too, but not as much as the second time, the second time, in October, 217 when there was an attack on Rojova, Türkiye 's attack on Rojova, they said "we will take you to the border, 218 we will shoot you in the head, we will say that we killed you because you are a terrorist". They said they 219 would do that now. (TN 16, Pos. 61)

220
221 Police house searches (15 quotes): Many interviewees described police house searches as 222 unjustified and as a serious invasion of privacy. Some said that police officials had entered the 223 house by smashing the door, put the residents on the floor, and stomping them with their feet.
224 For several participants, this dominant behaviour caused high levels of psychological stress and 225 a feeling of constant insecurity. Some interviewees stated that police officers threatened family 226 members and caused an insecure environment, which they felt had a high impact on neighbours 227 who were intimidated and afraid to approach the family afterwards. One threw away copies of 228 books and newspapers in the night of the coup attempt and thereafter in fear of oppression.

229 At first, we were subjected to the screams of our friends in the next room as a result of the tortures inflicted 230 on them. Psychological torture such as "We will come to you soon, we will sweat on you, then we will make 231 you scream the same screams". I can already say that apart from the beatings, punches, kicks and hair 232 pulling. Then psychological torture such as showing us the bloodied bodies of our friends in the next room 233 and saying "take a good look at this, you will never see it again" and making us fear that he would be killed.
234 (TN 2, Pos. 45)

235

236 In the incident in Istanbul, for example, after the coup, our house was raided many times, our doors were 237 broken down in the morning, inside, I mean, very arbitrary treatment, they scattered everything, the books I 238 read were officially printed books, books that were not forbidden but were forbidden according to them. (TN 239 5, Pos. 5)

240
241 They took turns passing my mum, swearing at her. My mum still doesn't say the swear words. She just says 242 "they told me very bad things about you". I don't know what they said. Then they got in line and spat in my 243 mum's face. (TN 10, Pos. 93-94)

244
245 Violence at demonstrations (28 quotes) and at the peace rally in Ankara 2015 (22 quotes):

246 Interviewees described several occasions when they experienced oppression by the state police 247 at peaceful demonstrations, others observed violence between protestors and state officials. The 248 allegations of various participants in the context of the peace rally in Ankara 2015 concerned 249 delays and failure to provide aid in the aftermath. Several interviewees accused the secret 250 service of knowing about the suicide bombings without publishing a warning to the population, 251 pointing out that the police were absent during the beginning of the protest march, which was 252 unusual for such a big event. After the bombing, various interviewees depicted horrific scenes 253 of blood all across the square and human remains everywhere on the ground, even on the clothes 254 and hair of survivors.

255 We already call the bombing there a terrorist state. Apart from that, I think people are being tortured 256 psychologically, because if people are still psychologically unable to come to their senses, if they commit
257 suicide, it means that both forms of torture exist. (TN 17, Pos. 75-76)

258
259 There was always the danger, getting caught... For example... If I were in Türkiye now, I would be caught, I 260 would be put in jail, but no information would be presented anywhere. I mean, the police would say, "this 261 man has done this, he has done that". Therefore, there is already such distrust and psychological pressure 262 on everyone. This is currently being applied. The man can lock up whoever he wants, kill whoever he wants, 263 but there are also these heavy things I mentioned. I grew up with these stories. You can listen to thousands 264 of these stories. (TN 15, Pos. 26)

265
266 Detention and police custody, charges, and prison conditions (126 quotes): The majority 267 mentioned that the police had taken them into temporary custody. Indeed, the interviewees 268 described that so many people were taken to custody that it started to feel almost ordinary to 269 them. In custody, they mentioned different lengths of stay under custody, from several hours to 270 weeks, during which the prisons offered little space, food or water. Sometimes they weren't 271 allowed to use the toilet or shower. Some interviewees also felt that wardens deliberately spread 272 distrust among detainees, used body searches to humiliate them or isolated them completely.

273 Another participant described complete darkness in isolation and that calls and visits were 274 prohibited. Under police custody, several interviewees reported that they were not allowed to 275 contact family and friends, spent hours in painful handcuffs, and that constant intentional 276 disturbances led to no rest. Some felt that soldiers and police officers tried to humiliate them to 277 make them feel small and to prove their authority. One described that they were forced to slap 278 each other in the face. One participant mentioned that she was in an isolation cell for one year.
279 Another described that there were no beds and people had to sleep on cardboard boxes on the 280 floor in overcrowded rooms.

281 We didn't want to give our fingerprints and were discussing it... They said, "Either you give your prints 282 voluntarily or we will take them by breaking your fingers." (TN 1, Pos. 31-34)

283
284 Likewise, you go to the forensic medicine, the doctor there also plays his part in this, even if not directly 285 physically. I mean, you've got bruises all over you, there is blood coming out of your nose, I don't know, 286 some people's eyes are closed, and they can't be opened, but they can give you a healthy report without 287 examining you at all. (TN 7, Pos. 23)

288
289 Violence in the context of conflicts in Kurdish areas (38 quotes): Several interviewees described 290 violence in the context of conflicts in the Kurdish areas, especially in violent conflicts and 291 curfews in Cizre, but also in Nusaybin and Diyarbakir. Participants mentioned bombings and 292 that civilians were burnt alive. Two interviewees recalled the public campaign and threats 293 against the "Academics for Freedom", followed by their suspension, as a reaction to their 294 petition to cease state violence in mainly Kurdish populated areas.

295 Because what happened was not normal. The bodies were all burnt to ashes, like burning wood. The bodies 296 were unrecognisable now, some of them still could not identify their bodies. Torture, okay, war is war, but 297 war is on the mountain, not in the city. You kill the ones on the mountain, but so much torture, so much
298 burning, so human; I don't know, you can't place it anywhere. (TN 17, Pos. 50)

299

300 Violence of civil government supporters (25 quotes): Participants described right-wing 301 government supporters set fire to Kurdish stores and entered private homes and pelted them 302 with stones, sometimes with the support of local police. They stated they were at the mercy of 303 constant harassment and persecution. One teacher reported that she was accused by families of 304 her students of spreading Kurdish propaganda in her classes and was therefore threatened via 305 social media.

306 I received a message on Facebook saying, "We will wipe the Kurdish race off the face of the earth". A man I 307 don't know personally sent me his genitals, he posted it as a picture, and it was a message like "I will make 308 you moan under me until you say ' How lucky anyone can be who calls himself a Turk'". (TN 13, Pos. 36)

309 I am convinced that the physical and psychological pressure outside is also torture, so there is definitely a 310 connection between them. Because that is the perception and the mentality. There is a perception that "you 311 can do whatever you want to those who are not of your kind, you can say whatever you want" and they believe 312 that they are powerful. Of course, they are really powerful because they have the state behind them. That's 313 why it's torture for me. (TN 13, Pos. 51)

315

316 Sexualised violence (13 quotes): Participants, both female and male, described different forms 317 of sexualised violence. Various participants described that there was constant harassment, even 318 outside prisons, in contact with police officers and that they were touched inappropriately. One 319 described specific insults because of her bisexuality, another received explicit pictures of male 320 genitals and threats about being raped. As one of many torture methods, one male participant 321 depicted he had to kneel with police officers positioned behind him, threatening to insert an 322 object into him.

323 There was sexual harassment at every detention. (TN 10, Pos. 60)

324

325 I was afraid that they would rape me, that they would catch me somewhere, that they would do something to 326 me... Because Türkiye is very convenient in this sense. You live alone, you are a single woman, you have 327 been defamed by a very dangerous newspaper, and we know how dangerous their supporters are. (TN 13, 328 Pos. 36)

329

330 They wanted to force me to undress for the body search... They didn't manage to do that... But this was a 331 threat, in between they constantly insulted me, like... about my sexual identity, for example... "Let the female 332 police come if you want" and similar disgusting "jokes". (TN 1, Pos. 35)

334 Psychological consequences

335 Considering that all participants had experienced some form of state repression in Türkiye, 336 every interviewee described their acute response in a situation of imminent danger, emotional 337 reactions during and after the events, as well as general long-term consequences.

338 Acute response (51 quotes): Most interviewees mentioned some form of emotional or mental 339 response to imminent danger. Many described being primarily afraid for relatives and friends 340 who were in a situation of danger with them, but also for those from whom they were separated.
341 Some reported they tried to stay calm or take the perpetrator's perspective, or to simply find a 342 way to save themselves and their acquaintances. Many interviewees felt responsible and guilty 343 that friends were in a difficult situation because of them. One participant stated that he suffered 344 such agony due to physical violence in prison that he wished for them to kill him right away.
345 Other participants reported that they did not even believe in survival. Some feared that officials 346 would make their corpses disappear so that their relatives would never know of their death.
347 Others described they only wished they would see their families again. Some participants stated 348 they resisted, others deliberately did not take a defensive position, but pretended to be ignorant 349 of the accusations. One described compliance to unnecessary police requirements out of fear.

350 At that moment, I thought they should kill me right away so that I could get out of there... Psychologically, I 351 was convinced that I would never get out of there. He also puts pressure on you by saying "you're here with 352 us for another 14 days "... "You won't get out of here yet"... At that moment you think to yourself, "I might as 353 well get killed now" (TN 4, Pos. 95-96)

354

355 In fact, you're not really thinking at that moment. You're just scared. There is fear, yes... There's no need to 356 pretend you were not afraid just to seem brave. You think that everything is over. (...) So in that moment you 357 are scared, in that moment you don't think anything, you don't feel anything. Maybe in a little moment of 358 emptiness, you might think a little bit, because you don't have any chance to think... What will you even think 359 about? (TN 10, Pos. 110-111)

360

361 Emotional reaction (in total 236 quotes): Several participants reported emotional difficulties in 362 association with the torture experienced. Some said they stopped feeling at all, some developed 363 strength to handle the dangers they were confronted with. The most common themes mentioned 364 were fear, anger, inner conflicts, powerlessness and hopelessness, sadness and grief, as well as 365 shame and guilt. Many participants described grief for their losses and overwhelming sadness 366 since they arrived in Germany. Some participants expressed sadness that they could not witness 367 important life events, such as weddings or funerals, because they were in Germany. They 368 pondered with their decision to leave Türkiye because they felt they had abandoned their family 369 and friends. One participant stressed that he felt guilty that his children had to endure difficulties 370 because of his decisions.

371 Everything was meaningless to me now. I couldn't cry, I couldn't laugh, there was such an intermediate tone 372 in my emotions (...) Everything was meaningless now. I started thinking, "After this hour, even if all of 373 Türkiye is liberated, even if this despotism is overthrown, there is no point anymore." Because terrible things 374 had happened. There had been war crimes. (TN 15, Pos. 22)

375

376 I feel guilty towards them. Yes, anyone can experience this stress and troubles in our latitudes, but I was 377 fighting for something, for the values I believe in. But I say, "I wish I hadn't included them". I wonder if there 378 was ever a chance to not include them. (TN 16, Pos. 165)

379

380 Fear and anxiety (46 quotes): Almost every participant reported to have experienced some form 381 of fear because of state repression and torture. Some knew the prison that they were taken to 382 from stories and were afraid of what would await them there. Once inside, they were afraid to 383 be called into interrogation, one interviewee said. One participant described hiding his fear so 384 as not to further frighten other (female) prison inmates. Fear was present in dangerous situations 385 as when the state of emergency was proclaimed and in everyday life when threats reached them.
386 Several interviewees highlighted that, eventually, it was the most prominent motivation for the 387 flight to Germany. Some described inner unrest when they spot police officers even today.

388 Others experienced panic attacks and where overwhelmed by fear when something reminded 389 them of their frightful experiences.

390 And we were all afraid that... Little did we know that it would be just those two suicide bombings. I was sure 391 I was going to die that day. I was sure of it. (TN 11, pos. 26)

392
393 I was always anxious, to be honest. Unfortunately, there was a period when I had to constantly look to the 394 right and to the left because something would happen at any moment, something would come out of 395 somewhere. (TN13, Pos.43)

396
397 Anger and Impulsivity (33 quotes): Many participants described that they showed higher levels 398 of impulsivity and aggression since the events. Some hoped for revenge and demanded 399 accountability, for several interviewees anger was a driver of motivation and hope. Others 400 described that the injustices they had observed created a need to shout and express anger. Some 401 said they did not express the anger, however, or directed it against themselves.

402 For a while I was very angry, then that anger turned into sentimentality, then for a while I was unable to feel 403 anything towards anyone or anything, including my parents. Now, I don't know if it's because of those 404 periods, but for example, I'm a person who gets angry very quickly, who has an immediate outburst of anger, 405 but I'm also extremely emotional. (TN 6, Pos. 101)

406
407 I mean, I had an extreme anger, and after a while that anger scabbed over. It wasn't a very painful anger 408 anymore; it was something else. Nothing made sense anymore. (TN 15, Pos. 22)

409
410 Powerlessness and Hopelessness (24 quotes): Some interviewees described that they were not 411 able to process what was happening around them in dangerous situations, so they froze and 412 could not react. Several participants experienced major hopelessness, or they felt despair like 413 they were at a dead end. Some accused the European Union of not intervening.

414 So, we waited, then we looked, there were some friends on the ground, some of them were injured, some of 415 them were dead, these two friends... We didn't do anything, to be honest... I mean, I couldn't react... Because 416 I didn't fully understand what was happening... (TN 3, Pos. 97)

417
418 I remember during that time, from August onwards, when in Sur and Diyarbakir, in Ahmet, many people 419 were... were killed. I remember that, I am not exaggerating, I had to cry every night. Always in my bed. I 420 cried, cried, cried, I felt powerless. I thought to myself, it's not possible, I can't go on like this under these 421 conditions. (TN 11, pos. 24)

422
423 Now, people generally have good intentions and most of the society in Europe understands us. Not all people 424 think evil, but the state is a different organism and all the states in Europe know very well what is going on,
425 but they remain silent. They continue to trade with Türkiye, they continue to sell arms, they continue to 426 support Erdogan financially. Because Europeans think very analytically, the states. So, if Türkiye 427 experiences a serious chaos, refugees will start coming in a different way. Türkiye is currently a member of 428 NATO. If it withdraws from it and turns towards Russia, the calculations of Europe and America will be 429 mixed up. So, analytical in that sense. (TN 15, Pos. 24)

430
431 Courage and strength (67 quotes): Numerous participants expressed that they had shown 432 strength in moments of great danger. They had resisted provocations of police officers and kept 433 calm to avoid greater difficulties. Some stated that their will to survive grew when they hit rock 434 bottom and suffered from the deepest pain. Many interviewees stated they told themselves to 435 be strong and brave because others would be worse off. One participant vigorously sought 436 international courts to work for a just verdict regarding the events in Türkiye. His way to 437 maintain strength, he said, was to always seek purpose. Many described that they wanted to 438 stay in place to resist, but in the end, it had not been possible, so they fled to Germany.

439 And this loud noise, they are trying to drive you mad, they are brainwashing you. At that time, as one of the 440 psychological resistances, I created a resistance by directing my mind to other things that I could occupy
441 myself with, creating a little world in my head, in my mind, in that noise. (TN 21, Pos. 35)

442 443 But after a while, the fear is gone... Courage replaces fear... I guess that's what you think... "I have to take 444 precautions myself... What else can he do... The most he can do is kill... He's doing what he's going to do, 445 what else is left?" (TN 4, Pos. 96)

446
447 When I saw that I was still alive after the fall, I realised that they hadn't thrown me out of the window. Do 448 people still want to live after all they have been through? I did. (TN 10, Pos. 62)

449
450 Think of it this way, our aim was to make our voices heard even in the furthest corners of the prison, so that 451 we can communicate what is happening to the outside or to different places, it also removes some of the 452 weight of the attack. And then you shout your slogans and experience torture. (TN 14, Pos. 40)

453
454 Long-term consequences (in total 212 quotes): The interviewees reported different aspects of 455 long-term psychological and psychosomatic consequences of their aversive experiences in 456 Türkiye. This included a lack of trust as well as a sense of injustice. Several participants 457 described stress symptoms, exhaustion, heaviness, listlessness, and rumination or inner tension.

458 Some participants said they used cigarettes to calm themselves after arousal, some mentioned 459 suicidal thoughts. Most interviewees stated that they experienced memory lapses and 460 difficulties in concentrating, or other psychosomatic complaints, such as fatigue and headaches.
461 Many reported loss of appetite and weight loss, insomnia, nightmares and problems sleeping 462 through the night. One participant described facial and body rashes due to psychosomatic stress.
463 Another participant mentioned frequent nausea and dizziness since the imprisonment and 464 another interviewee severe back pain and a herniated disk.

465 I guess I must have been a little bit nervous... I've been distracted... I'm having troubles concentrating on 466 anything... And the feeling of tiredness... (TN 4, Pos. 108)

467
468 I get angry all of a sudden. I have sudden crying fits. I mean, the slightest, the smallest thing can remind me
469 of the past even if I'm laughing normally, at that moment I can immediately break away from that environment 470 and go there. I can't help it; I can't stop it.

471 Sometimes my brain stops, I can't think of anything. I'm in such a void, I force myself, I force myself, I force 472 myself, I force myself, I force myself, I can't think of anything. That moment ends there. (TN 10, Pos. 166- 473 167)

474
475 I cannot imagine any positive dreams. For example, let's say I go from here to the centre, I cannot dream of 476 happiness, I say to myself 'the opposite will happen'. I feel anxious, as if the good things I want to do will 477 always be the opposite. (TN 16, Pos. 166-168)

478
479 Hypervigilance and lack of trust (46 quotes): Several interviewees reported that most often, 480 they checked their surroundings for any possible threat and that they were alarmed when they 481 spotted police officers, also outside of Türkiye. Some participants stated they avoided social 482 contacts in Türkiye and no longer trusted anyone.

483 It's a very basic feeling of insecurity. For example, before I used to go to bed without closing my curtains, 484 but after this incident I felt like someone was watching me all the time, and so you can't be comfortable at 485 all... At first, I was very anxious, and I had to constantly check everything left and right. (TN 1, Pos. 94)

486
487 Sensitivity to sudden noises, if this glass falls down, for example. Anxiety about radio noise, sudden noises 488 at night or if someone wakes me up suddenly. (...) I mean, I am in a state of panic, I am in a constant state of 489 alertness. (TN 2, Pos. 73)

490

491 I didn't trust anyone, to be honest... Until I left Türkiye... (TN 21, Pos. 45)

492

493 Isolation, loneliness, and silence (25 quotes): Many reported that in order to protect themselves 494 or others from bad emotions and pain, they did not talk about their experiences state repression 495 and torture. They said their relatives received only rough information about their detention and 496 injuries.

497 I don't talk to anyone so that I don't make others feel bad, so that I don't make them feel bad. (TN 12, Pos.
498 91)

500 So, I experienced the same stress at home, so I went into a room and closed the door so as not to hurt my 501 children, so as not to upset them. This situation made me more and more isolated. (TN 16, Pos. 154)

502

503 Suppressing feelings and forgetting (43 quotes): Some participants described they avoided to 504 think about their aversive experiences, others mentioned they blocked out the news that could 505 remind them of it. Some forgot parts of the torture experience or other abuses.

506 Because of all this, I always want to escape from myself, I always want to run away from myself. Let me stay 507 away from these problems, from these issues. (TN 16, Pos. 170)

508

509 Because people protect themselves and they do things. For example, as if it never happened, you freeze things 510 that cause you severe trauma, as if it never happened, as if it hurts you so much that you freeze it and put it
511 in the closet, as if it never happened. And after a while you start to believe it. (TN 20, Pos. 14)

512

513 Current Situation

514 Political Conviction and Religious Belief (64 quotes): Most interviewees stated that their 515 political or religious conviction helped them to overcome the aversive experiences they had and 516 to move on. Many described that they were prepared by the stories of other political activists, 517 which made it easier for them to process the events. It served as a resource to classify and 518 process what had happened and to demand justice.

519 Our experiences became heavier with every second. That, of course, because of our political beliefs, and the 520 work we did. But because we did it in full awareness of the consequences, we could be a little bit more 521 prepared, (...) knowing that there might be problems. And at the same time, I can cope a little bit more myself 522 because I see and I know that I am not the only one who has experienced it and that there are others who

523 have experienced it more severely. I mean, there are others who have been through it worse, and if they have 524 been able to get through it, you can get through it too, or we can get through it all together. (TN 2, Pos. 101)

525
526 Actually, it is not us who are dishonoured... Those who let us experience this degrading treatment should 527 also be the ones whose dignity is taken away... How can they look their children in the eyes? Actually, when 528 you think about it, they are the ones who are dishonoured... (TN 14, Pos. 75)

529
530 Psychologically I think these feelings help me. Let me put it this way, for example: if you ask me "do you 531 regret it", I don't regret it at all. Even if the same thing happened to me again, I think that in principle, 532 ethically, as a human being, if I am doing something for humanity, I should go on doing it. (TN 21, Pos. 51)

533
534
535 Subjective well-being, work and social activities (74 quotes): Many participants noticed

536 performance impairments in themselves that they related to their experiences with torture. and 537 criticised their general state of health. Most participants reported they had no regular daily 538 structure, especially those who lived in a refugee camp with an insecure asylum status. Several 539 participants hoped to find work or their own apartment soon but said that this was more 540 complicated due to the Covid-19 pandemic. In general, interviewees were socially integrated 541 in Turkish communities and mentioned friends in Germany. Many reported taking care of 542 themselves by going for walks, listening to music or reading books and watching videos but 543 some felt they didn't have the strength to do so at the moment.

544 Sometimes I still feel like I'm watching a movie when I'm walking around in Germany, in the woods, at the 545 lake, etc... Is it real or is it just another dream? Because I dreamt every day for a year. Every day I dreamt 546 that I was leaving the country to start a new life with my family abroad. (...) So now I feel like I'm dreaming
547 again. (TN 22, Pos. 48)

548
549 I go for walks regularly, I try to eat, but no matter how much I do, this life in the refugee accommodation 550 always stops me from doing something and I stay there. That's why I don't do anything. (TN 8, Pos. 178)

551
552 What's happened has already happened. You don't see it as if nothing happened, but at least you can take a 553 deep breath. But something is still squeezing my heart. You breathe, but your chest isn't full. (...) There's 554 something missing. (TN 15, Pos. 24)

555 556 Plans for the Future (34 quotes): About half of the interviewees felt optimistic about their 557 future. Others expressed doubt about their general situation in Germany and whether they could

558 achieve their goals. One participant said that he no longer made long-term plans, because all 559 his plans had been interrupted when he had to flee Türkiye and he feared this to happen once 560 again when the authorities cancelled his residence permit.

561 Generally, I feel that my motivation to live has dropped a lot. Waking up in the morning, facing the day,
562 experiencing the excitement of the day are things that I haven't felt for a long time, ever since I came here...
563 (TN 18, Pos. 107)

564
565 What we're going to do here will always refer to there. That's what will always remain unresolved in my 566 heart as long as I can't go back to Türkiye. Running down the street with the camera in my hand. Because 567 that's what I want, because that's what I did, because that's what I learned... So, on the one hand we were 568 the ones who experienced the torture, but on the other hand we were also the ones who somehow documented
569 it. (TN 2, Pos. 141)

571 Discussion

572 Torture is a profound public health concern because it seeks to undermine not only the physical 573 and emotional well-being of individuals but also the coherence of entire communities. In this 574 regard, the use of torture and other degrading treatment as state repression is a method to 575 weaken a whole subpopulation. In this unique research project, we documented the emotional 576 and physical reactions of survivors of torture and state repression that fled to Germany to seek 577 asylum.

578 To our knowledge, only one phenomenological study focused on posttraumatic growth in 579 witnesses to the coup attempt exists so far (29), and ours is the first study to depict the human 580 rights violations experienced by various Turkish citizens. No other study has interviewed 581 politically or religiously active Kurdish or otherwise threatened Turkish citizens about their 582 experience during the period of 2015 – 2018 before. The reports of twenty asylum-seekers from 583 Türkiye transmit a portrait of a suppressive state that uses illicit means to silence human rights 584 activists and political opponents. The methods described by various interviewees are consistent 585 with similar reports from the last decades about the use of unlawful treatment of dissidents, 586 especially Kurds (4,8,11). The depicted strategies to humiliate detainees were diverse and 587 spanned from threats to unjustified dominant behaviour under police custody to electric shocks.

588 In the descriptions of violence from state officers and the seemingly flawed system of routine 589 medical controls, a power imbalance is clearly perceptible.

590 The fear and hypervigilance described by several participants appears to reach such levels that 591 some suffer from PTSD, anxiety disorder, or panic disorder in the aftermath of the events. Some 592 saw this as a contrast to the confident and self-righteous demeanour of members and supporters 593 of the government. Several participants described symptoms of depression, like heaviness and 594 rumination, and some describe suicidal thoughts. This is an alarming sign for the mental health 595 burden that is caused by state repression and torture. In light of our study, the need for more 596 efforts to support refugees that have experienced extreme violence is evident.

597 The overall health of the interviewees seemed to be severely threatened after their experiences 598 of torture and state repression. Some participants displayed signs of addiction from cigarettes 599 as a form of self-medication to calm themselves, others suppressed their emotions or isolated 600 themselves from family and friends. In the face of the experiences as well as the flight to 601 Germany, immense exhaustion became apparent. The months of inner tension had left their 602 marks on most interviewees. For many, political and religious beliefs were of great importance.
603 They found comfort in the fact that their relatives and peers had already experienced 604 imprisonment and police custody and the support they received by them. This way, they felt a 605 sense of unity and purpose despite the violence that was inflicted on them. Their recovery was 606 often limited by the current living situation under Covid-19, their insecure asylum status, and 607 conditions in refugee camps. Most of them were socially integrated in Turkish communities in 608 Germany.

609

610 Limitations

611 First of all, the presented experiences of torture and state violence are derived from individual 612 narratives and reflect the interviewees' opinion only. Due to our qualitative approach, this study 613 includes only a small number of participants and is far from representative. Nevertheless, we 614 managed to interview Turkish citizens from various groups as Kurds, Alevis, and supporters of 615 the Gülen movement.

616 When we conducted the first interviews, we realised that not all interviewees had been 617 imprisoned, as formerly expected, but still every interviewee had experienced aversive and 618 degrading treatment in Türkiye. All of them identified as survivors of torture, defined by them 619 as illicit actions by the state against individuals or groups of people. It is debatable whether 620 these events meet the official definition of torture, given the severity of the pain and suffering 621 apparent in the reports and the clear connection to political activities. Moreover, following the 622 Istanbul Protocol on the documentation of torture and other cruel, inhuman, or degrading 623 treatment, the victim perspective is considered to be crucial in the evaluation of aversive 624 experiences (1). This topic remains open for discussion.

625

626 Conclusion

627 This study is an important contemporary testimony of a relevant period in Turkish history. The 628 collected reports of torture and state repression and its psychological impact send an alarming 629 sign for policy makers to address the prevention of human rights violations and the support 630 needs of survivors.
